Abstract

This study examined Mmemme Igboto Mma n'Alayi as a traditional retirement practice and an aspect of the cultural heritage of the Alayi people. The study focused on the meaning, origin, procedure, participation and cultural significance of Igboto Mma in Alayi. A qualitative approach based on oral information and documentary research was adopted, using relevant literature and oral interviews. The information obtained was organized and analysed according to the themes that emerged and was compared with and discussed alongside relevant literature on Igbo culture, age-grade institutions, traditional retirement and cultural heritage. The findings showed that Igboto Mma connects tradition with the retirement of an age grade from active communal labour and responsibilities. The ceremony provides the community with an opportunity to recognize and honour an age grade that is retiring after years of service, and it marks their transition into a stage of life associated with seniority, rest, advice and community leadership. The ceremony involves community participation, hospitality, food, gifts and invited guests, while members of the retiring age grade may also organize additional celebrations with their families and friends. After retirement, they may join the community's senior elders and participate in decision-making, peace panels and dispute settlement. The findings also showed that retirees may be exempted from certain communal activities, the payment of some dues and certain financial contributions made within the community. Therefore, Igboto Mma is not merely the end of physical labour; it represents a change in responsibility and social status within the community. The seminar concludes that Igboto Mma is an important aspect of the cultural heritage of the Alayi people because it connects age, communal service, family and community responsibilities, respect for elders, peace and cultural continuity.
